"Miegakure", the puzzle game that came to the iPad ($3.99) isn't quite as polished as its infinitely more expensive dance game cousin, dance Central. But it's still an interesting puzzler with a few neat touches, like the ability to solve puzzles by tilting your iPad landscape-style, which is less comfortable on most tablets. The game's design is also insanely addictive, and frankly this seems like a game that you continue to play even after you've completed it for fear of losing all your progress via some sort of sinister download counter. And unlike in Rez and Child of Eden, there's no soundtrack to die for in the background: The music here is nothing short of generic. But in a game where your surroundings constantly morph and twist in response to your moves, it actually makes complete sense. The only question is how much you're willing to pay for such a seemingly simple puzzle game without much innovation or flash.
