In clinical practice, the use of the patient-specific instrument (PSI) in the anteroposterior and lateral radiographic recordings is evaluated by comparing the position of landmarks and instruments in the operative field and in the radiographic recordings. A total of fifty-six unilateral procedures in 53 patients were examined. The PSI with its associated recording device and a panoramic digital radiography system were used in all examinations. The study group included 27 males and 26 females, with a mean age of 33.7 years. The total number of case records was 59. Two investigators, each blinded to the results of the other, recorded positions of the PSI and surgical instruments and compared the two sets of position. The evaluation of PSIs in anteroposterior and lateral radiographs obtained at the time of surgery and at the time of the first control was carried out as a secondary objective of the study.
